Conditional Order

This is not the final order. This conditional order does not end your marriage. Your marriage will end when the final order is made.

This is a record of the orders made by Judge Lorient sitting at Birmingham court on 21 February 2022:

The judge held that the marriage solemnised on 20 February 2000 at London, UK between Monica Thorpe and Rox Thorpe has broken down irretrievably.

The applicant can apply for a final order from 4 April 2022. This is because 6 weeks has to pass before the conditional order can be made final.

Your legal right and responsibilities will change after you have divorced

After you're divorced:

- any right you may have to a pension which depends on the marriage continuing will be affected
- you will not be able to claim a state widow's pension when your husband dies
- any matrimonial home rights you may have (under Part IV of the Family Law Act 1996) will cease, unless the court has ordered otherwise before the divorce is granted
- you will lose your right to inherit from your husband if they die without having made a will
- If your husband has made a will, you will not have any right, which you may have under that will, to act as executor, trustee, or as a donee of a power of appointment or to take any gift under the will, unless a contrary intention appears in the will
- If your husband has appointed you to become guardian of their children on their death, a divorce will deprive you have any right which you may have to act as a guardian (unless your husband specifies otherwise)

A divorce may have other consequences, depending on your circumstances. If you are in any doubt about these you should seek legal advice.
